Local Journalist and Indigenous Rights Advocate to Unveil Vision for Groundbreaking Documentary at Indigenous Peoples' History Day Celebration

REDDING, Calif. — In a milestone event set to captivate audiences, local journalist and esteemed Pit River member, Sky Scholfield, will unveil the ambitious plans for his upcoming documentary, tentatively titled “The Pit River Documentary,” during the Indigenous Peoples' History Day celebration. Scheduled for Saturday, Oct. 12, at 1:45 p.m., the presentation will take place at the historic Cascade Theatre, 1731 Market St., Redding.

Scholfield's groundbreaking project promises an intimate exploration of the Pit River people's rich history, language, art, music, spirituality, and political resilience spanning from 1850 to the present day. Delving into three generations' stories, the documentary will vividly recount the painful genesis of California, the hard-fought battles to reclaim their ancestral lands in the 1970s, and the ongoing struggle against environmental degradation orchestrated by multinational corporations threatening their cherished homelands.

At this pivotal event, Scholfield invites the community to join him in shaping this significant narrative. Emphasizing the film's unique perspective, he envisions a story about the Pit River people told by the Pit River People.

Key Highlights of the Presentation:

- Unveiling the comprehensive vision behind “The Pit River Documentary.”
- Introduction of the esteemed production team, including Native community organizer Jonathon Freeman, renowned travel writer, and California historian Kim Weir, esteemed Pit River cultural leaders Radley and Louise Davis, social media consultant Austen Krantz, experienced filmmaker Grant Hayes, and video coordinator Claire Haines.
- Launching the Indiegogo campaign to crowdfund the initial stages of this transformative project.

“We are not just crafting a documentary; we are preserving a legacy. This film is an homage to our past, a testament to our resilience, and a call for solidarity in the face of modern challenges,” Scholfield said.

To support this groundbreaking endeavor, the Pit River community and allies are encouraged to participate in the Indiegogo campaign, which marks the initial step toward transforming this visionary project into reality.
